Unit description

The family is full of paradoxes. While it is an intimate space of love, safety and nurturance, people frequently experience conflicts and even violence. The family and home are often considered private sites, but they are also popular topics of intense public debate and major targets of government intervention. In this unit, we examine the increasingly diverse ways in which family life is imagined and practised in contemporary societies. The focus is on how families are bound up with gender, sexuality, race/ethnicity, class and nation-states. By exploring topics such as work-life balance, marriage and friends-as-family, students interpret the changing landscapes of families, and analyse the interlinkage between their personal lives and wider social and cultural changes. The knowledge and skills you gain in this unit will help you understand important current issues concerning families and generate ideas to build a just world.

Changes from Previous Offering

Based on student feedback via the informal, mid-semester 2-minute paper as well as the formal TEDS survey, the main assignment has been re-developed to allow for two options. A new form of class participation for OUA students has also been implemented, following the positive student evaluation of this method in another unit of the convenor's.
