Unit description

Work is core to our sense of self and identity. It provides us with status, self-esteem and recognition. As individuals, however, we are not always in control of the way work is organised. The growing gap between the rich and the poor, rising job insecurity and the emergence of the digital economy all affect how we work. This unit unpacks the relationship between work, self and society. First, we examine the role work played in pre-industrial societies. Second, we investigate the impacts on the self and society of large-scale changes occurring in industrial and post-industrial societies such as automation, and the increasing demand for workplace diversity and inclusion. Finally, we contemplate what a fairer, more equal organisation of work in the future looks like by considering ideas such as a shorter working week, gender quotas or a universal basic income. This unit suits students from all disciplines.

Important Academic Dates

Information about important academic dates including deadlines for withdrawing from units are available at <https://www.mq.edu.au/study/calendar-of-dates>

Learning Outcomes

On successful completion of this unit, you will be able to:

ULO1: identify the characteristics of work and employment and their consequences for individual, organisational and social wellbeing.

ULO2: recognise the main social and economic processes and logics defining the world of work and how they influence other major parts of life.

ULO3: distinguish the main drivers and mechanisms that shape the culture of workplaces and work societies.

ULO4: recognise the meaning of work and employment in an increasingly globalised world where local work processes are shaped by global dynamics.

ULO5: express specific social and economic ideas in writing and verbally.
