Unit description

Tourism is one of the fastest growing economic sectors globally and is considered one of the key drivers of socio-economic development. The sector contributes to employment, infrastructure development and export revenues in a growing number of destinations. Heritage is a key component of many tourist experiences today, but also an important element of the cultural industry of cities and regions. This unit deals with a critical understanding of both tourism and heritage and their complex relationship. It explores the theories and practices of contemporary tourism and travel in relation to heritage and their implications for people and places. Key challenges related to tourism's impact on social, environmental and economic livelihoods will be considered, as well as the various mechanisms that have been used to minimise such impacts. A variety of empirical cases around the world will be analysed in order to link modern tourism theory to a set of practices and performances within tourist destinations and students will contemplate the future of tourism and sustainable heritage management by drawing on different approaches to tourism development. Overall students will gain a comprehensive understanding of tourism and heritage in contemporary societies.
