Unit description

When asked why they are involved in politics, many Australian politicians will answer that they want to make the country a better place, that they want to improve people's welfare and wellbeing, that they want to make a difference. We don't have to look far, however, to observe entrenched inequality, social division, unmet human needs and unfulfilled lives. This tension between the promise of politics and the lack of responsiveness of the political system to a large portion of the Australian population, and its consequences for inequality and human wellbeing, is the focus of this unit. Students explore these inequalities, and their political causes and consequences, through the lenses of race, nation, class and gender.

Important Academic Dates

Information about important academic dates including deadlines for withdrawing from units are available at <https://www.mq.edu.au/study/calendar-of-dates>

Learning Outcomes

On successful completion of this unit, you will be able to:

ULO1: Demonstrate the ability to peer below the surface feature of Australian politics and its discourses to identify the underlying inequalities at play

ULO2: Understand and identify linkages between class, race, gender and Australian nationhood

ULO3: Critically analyse Australian politics and assess the ways in which it reinforces, reduces or normalises inequality

ULO4: Demonstrate capacity to assess the extent that the media and new technologies impact – if at all – on the reproduction of existing social relations

ULO5: Demonstrate critical understanding of the interplay between discourse, ideology, structures and agency in shaping the makeup of Australian society in terms of race, nation, class and gender

Delivery and Resources

Welcome to Australian Politics, Inequality and Wellbeing.

Australia has often been imagined as a nation where egalitarianism and a "fair-go" have shielded the general population from the inequalities and injustices faced in many other countries. This is a myth that is still prominent in our politics and public discourse, and one that does not stand up to even the mildest of scrutiny. This unit will interrogate this myth through the lens of key dimensions of inequality, including race, nation, class and gender. We will explore the ways in which these categories have been constructed historically, how they impact the well-being of different groups, and how they manifest themselves in contemporary Australian politics.

Unlike most other courses you will do at university, the unit will trace developments in its subject matter in real time and discuss new issues as they arise on a week-to-week basis. This will occur in conjunction with the main substantive themes of the unit. The aim is then to give students an experience of contemporary Australian politics that explores the possibilities of agency and choice for individuals and groups.

There is no set text for the unit. Instead, key weekly readings will be posted on iLearn, as well as any supplementary readings. In addition, the week's recorded lectures and power point slides will be found on iLearn, as well as a variety of other resources. To do well in the unit it is essential that students engage with the lectures and the readings as well as with each other in the weekly tutorials (in-person cohort) or in the weekly online discussion forums (online and in-person cohort).
